Newton Gun Club is a group[2] named after Black Panther Party founder Huey P. Newton. [3] The group teaches self-defense and has staged armed protests in favor of African-American gun rights[2] and against police brutality. [4] The club was founded by Rakem Balogun,[5] Yafeuh Balogun[6] and Babu Omowale. [7] The group gained national attention in August 2014 for its open carry patrols. Yafeuh Balogun expressed hope that the club would continue to grow and eventually become a mainstream gun-rights organization. [9] Activity In August 2014, Huey P. Newton Gun Club staged its first openly armed patrol through a predominantly black neighborhood in South Dallas, where police killed an unarmed black youth named James Harper in 2012. The club staged a new protest in October of that year. [9] In 2016, the coalition held a counter-protest at the Muhammed Mosque in South Dallas in response to a demonstration by the anti-Islamic Relations Agency (BAIR). Both sides were armed and the police were present during the protest, which ended briefly without violence. [12] [14] In 2016, both Rakem and Yafeuh Balogun distanced themselves from the organization. Rakem Balogun has cited the growing influence of the New Black Panther Party, which he regarded as a black separatist group, over the group as the reason for their resignation. [5] In a 2019 interview about Klepper, Rakem Balogun is seen leading a demonstration with three participants in the Huey P. Newton Gun Club. In May 2019, nine armed members showed up during a demonstration in Dayton, Ohio. Nine members of the Huey P. Newton Gun Club -- a group that advocates African-American gun rights -- came in full tactical gear with rifles. External links Official website Taken from Keith Lamont Scott, who was shot and killed by police in Charlotte, North Carolina, along with his wife and son. GoFundMe Tuesday shot and killed police officers in Charlotte, North Carolina, Keith Lamont Scott, a 43-year-old black man. According to police, an officer shot Scott after he refused repeated orders to drop a handgun. But North Carolina is an open-carry state, which means residents are allowed to carry firearms. So why was Scott's alleged possession of a weapon enough to shoot him? This was not the first high-profile incident of its kind. In 2014, Ohio police officers shot and killed John Crawford at a Walmart in Beavercreek, and in a separate shooting, 12-year-old Tamir Rice shot and killed outside a Cleveland recreation center, largely on the belief that Crawford and Rice were carrying real firearms - even though both carried toy guns. Ohio is also an open-carry state. Legal experts, however, say that open carrying laws and the laws governing police use of force don't really have much to do with each other. Here's why. Open carry laws have little effect on the legality of police use of force Forty-five states allowing their citizens to carry firearms openly in public, according to OpenCarry.org. Thirty of these states do not require permission to open carry. There are also varying regulations from state to state on how an unscathed gun is allowed. Ohio, for example, allows open carry a permit almost anywhere - with a big exception to keep a gun in a car, which requires a concealed carry permit. These laws usually allow people to carry guns in public without fear of arrest. Alan Gura, a lawyer who helped fight gun control laws in Washington, D.C., has previously said that in a state where open carrying is allowed, abuse of a firearm is definitely the basis for formal police intervention, but not just possession. But the open carry laws have little to do with whether a police shooting is justified, experts say. As lawyer and gun rights advocate David Kopel has previously explained, police officers would not necessarily be allowed to shoot someone just because he uses a gun where open carrying is not legal. During the two Supreme Court decisions - Tennessee v. Garner and Graham courage. Connor - who dictates the police's use of force, officers must show that they had an objectively reasonable belief that a suspect was a threat up to the moment the last bullet was fired. The officer has every right to intervene, to arrest, and so on. But that doesn't mean you can shoot the guy. Let's say there is no open carry, Kopel said. The officer has every right to intervene, to arrest, and so on. But that doesn't mean you can shoot the guy. Unless that person brandishes his gun in a threatening manner. Kopel explained, a police officer would not be justified in the shooting. Before the Crawford and Rice shootings, police officers reportedly heard from 911 callers that the suspects were waving firearms, which turned out to be a toy gun, in a threatening manner. The legal question for the officers involved in these shootings is not whether Crawford and Rice had the right to carry a gun in public, but whether they reasonably believed the reported threats were still present until the moment they shot Crawford and Rice. Open carrying laws doesn't matter. The same goes for Scott in North Carolina: Did officers reasonably believe that Scott branded his gun in a threatening manner and about to shoot them at that moment? That's the most important question, regardless of open carry laws. In the end, grand juries did not indicted the officers who shot Crawford or Rice, and agreed that the police involved in the separate shootings reasonably believed that the toy guns were actual firearms and were used in a threatening manner toward others. An investigation into Scott's death is underway. Can black men who openly carry a weapon be seen as more of a threat than others? After the shootings of Crawford, Rice and Scott, many asked if police treat black people who openly carry guns differently than their white counterparts. This will be a distraction. The question is: why is having a gun a problem in open carry when serving an arrest warrant for another man - Tressie Mc (@tressiemcphd) September 21, 2016 Charles Goodson, chairman of the Huey P. Newton Gun Club, previously called it a valid argument. He said his predominantly predominant The group, which holds regular open carry patrols and marches in Texas, has been harassed by heavily armed police in the past. In contrast, white supremacists led open protests in the state despite high levels of media scrutiny. Jamelle Bouie, a writer at Slate, expressed some of her concerns on Twitter, which was further echoed by the hashtag #BlackOpenCarry. White guy in public with a real gun? Open carry patriot. Black guy in public with a toy gun? A dead man. - Jamelle Bouie (@jbouie) August 7, 2014 I honestly think black people in open-carry states should embrace the law and travel with guns out, in groups, in public. — Jamelle Bouie (@jbouie) August 10, 2014 There is evidence to support this concern: Studies on implicit bias show that police unconsciously may perceive a black person with a gun as a threat lighter than a white person with a gun. By putting police officers through a video game simulation, Josh Correll of the University of Colorado Boulder found that police generally pull the trigger on black suspects than white suspects when the suspect was seen carrying a weapon. It may indicate that Correll told me that police officers may be more likely to shoot a black suspect in a real-life environment. In that situation [officers] most need their training, Correll said, we have some reason to believe that their training is most likely to fail them.
